Purpura maligna is a rare but usually lethal form of cutaneous lymphoma of which there are two types: classical and malignant. The classical type is a well-known entity which is found in haemodialysed patients. The malignant form appears in settings of other immunodeficiency and sometimes is encountered in the course of non-Hodgkin's lymphomas. In this article we describe a six-month-old baby and a four-year-old boy with purpura maligna. The first case was diagnosed in the presence of a paraneoplastic syndrome while the second patient was firstly observed as a case of idiopathic purpura

Q: GIT - Prevent commiting merged files - Jira We are using GIT for code version control and having some issues with committing merged files. The issue is that if any changes were made to a merged file and then another file is merged then sometimes commit fails with below error. D:\ProgramData\TestLocation\TestsRepository\MergedFile1.cs(19,19): Error: Merge conflicts between 'D:\ProgramData\TestLocation\TestsRepository\MergeFile2.cs' and 'D:\ProgramData\TestLocation\TestsRepository\MergeFile3.cs' So I need to find a way to prevent committing files which are merged. I have read this post - where the author states the following. "It is the merger which is evil" I understand that the reason for this error is because the exact file with same content as the file which was merged with is being committed. In our case the files are merged for issue tracking. Any suggestions on how to prevent commit of the files which were merged? A: I have solved the problem. The solution is to explicitly specify merge strategy and allow merge of untracked files. In our case there are few instances where files are split across branches. After merging the files we run a script which generates a list of files in both branches and update the version number and checksums. This list of files is then used for the merge. If either file is untracked, the merge is force and files are merged """ os ~~~~ .. versionadded:: 1.2 Operating system module.
